Notes to H. M.

1876. After the publication of the Book, Mr Atkinson writes to me: - "I hear of the publication of 70 letters from Mrs. Browning. Then, as Miss Barrett, lying in & early death & on her sick bed, she writes as follows, of Harriet Martineau then very ill at Tyne-mouth. —"

"I have had a great pleasure lately in some correspondence with Miss Martineau, the noblest female intelligence between the seas; as sweet as spring, as ocean deep. She is in hopeless anguish of body & serene triumph of spirit, with at once no hope & all hope."

To hear from her was at once a pleasure & an honour to me.

Recollections I have Many, which seemed at the time too trivial or too private in character to be printed in the Memoirs: — but I will preserve them as notes. One of them is a saying of Anne Weston when Harriet Martineau first came to America, & before I knew her: — "Whoever writes her life will not have the trouble of continually saying "What a great woman she is." I (meaning that the fact was a Self-evident?)

An Holyoke, in whom She was interested as a secund, & whose acquaintance

She made in 1852 when she was with me in London, has written, in the Boston Index, an appreciative notice of W. M., which I should have been sorry to receive too late but for the self-respecting animus of the whole. All he says of her is true, but used to illustrate Jacob Holyoake: & again, he states as if it were serious, a half-jocular remark, motivated by the notorious efforts of that "day among Catholics & Evangelicals, to make death-bed interviews to their respective faiths: - as for example, Mrs. Puck had to make that of her father - for James Mackintosh

I find, in the Journal of Harriet Martineau which so often mentions "the Oberlin" (as she always called the College she did so much for in the West, to replace her Seminary,) this statement:

"The sum raised in England for the Oberlin was £6000.

There is, among her papers, a very interesting letter to Mr. Smith, Publisher, whom her book on India).

There is a very elegant & interesting letter also, on the Faneuil Hall bill.
